Address: Danish Centre for Health Economics (DaCHE), Department of Public Health, University of Southern Denmark, Campusvej 55, 5230 Odense M, Denmark.

Scientific research interests

Anne Sophie Oxholm's research focuses on developing a better understanding of the supply-side of the healthcare market. More specifically, the impact of incentive schemes targeted healthcare providers, healthcare providers' motivational profiles and wellbeing, and how supply-side factors may create inequality in access to care. This research is based on development of theoretical models and empirical analyses using data from both administrative and clinical registers, surveys, and computer-based laboratory experiments. Anne Sophie Oxholm's studies are published in top field journals within health economics (e.g. Journal of Health Economics, Health Economics, and Social Science & Medicine). She has successfully conducted and led several large-scaled research projects using Danish healthcare data. She has also previously worked on assignments for both The Danish Regions and The Danish Ministry of Health and has been employed as a special advisor to The Danish council for remuneration of general practices.
